Several studies have demonstrated the benefits of demand reduction programs in the health care sector. Given the growing smoking prevalence in the general population and the increasing prevalence of smoking among the prison inmates, demand reduction strategies are an important health issue. This study aimed to identify the contextual factors and strategies to promoting demand reduction programs in a prison in the state of Pernambuco, Brazil. This qualitative study used a qualitative approach in the form of an exploratory study that used a focused content analysis technique in semi-structured interviews with three institutional stakeholders and semi-structured group interviews with representatives from four demand reduction programs in the prison. The contents analyzed were grouped into three categories: contextual factors; strategies to promote demand reduction programs; and the benefits of demand reduction programs. The study identified contextual, organizational, and individuals' factors that facilitated and hindered the development of demand reduction programs. The strategies that were used to promote demand reduction programs included the organization of activities, the development of institutional infrastructure and capacity building. The main benefits of demand reduction programs were health improvement and the reduction of costs for the prison system. This invention relates to a refractory core made from a combination of high temperature or refractory grade graphite as an inner core and high temperature steel as an outer layer. The refractory cores used in a variety of furnaces and cast iron ladles are required to withstand extremely high temperatures and utilize large amounts of graphite. For this purpose, the cores have been made in the past from many kinds of refractories, the most common type of the refractories being graphite. The inner core used in these cores usually has a high compressibility and behaves in a manner of a brittle material, whereas the outer layer has a high strength. When graphite is used, the core can be made thin and is capable of withstanding very high temperatures. On the other hand, the graphite is brittle at room temperature, requiring a considerably thick outer layer or reinforcement outside the core to increase its strength. Recently, there has been a strong demand for the core to be capable of withstanding the high temperatures over 1300.degree. C. And in order to keep the core from over-heating or becoming thermally deformed to provide against a shrinkage in its size, it is desirable to keep the core from being
